"Pelmanism."

By ADMIRAL LORD BERESFORD, G.C.B., G.C.V.O.

At the invitation of the Directors I have investigated the Pelman system. I judge it from the experience gained during the fifty years I was associated with the training of officers, men, and boys in the Royal Navy. The old sailing Navy provided the finest possible mental and physical training. It taught initiative, presence of mind, accurate observation, habitual defiance of danger, ready resource, and an extraordinary hardihood. At sea, a man holds his life on the condition that he possesses these qualities. Frequent emergencies are part of the ordinary routine, and the penalty of failing to meet them is inevitable. There is no arguing with a gale of wind.

Things happen oftener at sea than on land. There are moments when they happen so suddenly that there is no time to give an order, and a man must act instantly on his own initiative, and act rightly, or it will be too late. It was for this reason that the old sail drill and seamanship training were extremely rigorous. Neither the modern seaman nor the landsman owns any conception of the severity of sail drill in a Fleet, in which each ship strove to outdo the other, and in which many a man lost his life by falling from aloft. The emulation inspired by the competition of ship with ship in the Fleet, made a powerful motive for exertion and smartness. There was not then, and is not now, anything comparable with it on land. When the Navy changed from sail to steam, it became necessary to devise other methods to train the seaman to smartness, agility, and resource. Education in seamanship, evolutions, steam, electricity, gunnery, torpedo, signalling, and scientific physical training has made the modern naval seaman second to none.

Broadly speaking, the character and the abilities of the competent seaman enable him, should he leave the sea and enter a shore occupation, to learn it readily and to achieve success in a new career. Compared with the conditions which he has been accustomed to face, and the difficulties he habitually solves at sea, the seaman finds life ashore a much easier business. Now if we reverse the case, and send a landsman to sea, at first he would be helpless.

The object of the Pelman system is to enable the individual to bring all his powers into harmonious action. It would be true to say that to enable the student rightly to use his native abilities is the object of all education. The education of the sea, which is the system I know best, certainly fulfils that purpose. Now a great part of the education of a boy consists in learning how to use his powers, but without knowing what he is doing. He is set to learn lessons and perform tasks day after day the use of which he often fails to perceive. He does not understand, and he is not told, that the work he is made to do teaches him how to use his intellect. He thinks that education consists in acquiring information, in which very often he takes no interest whatever. Nevertheless, if he does the work required of him, he learns to use his powers unconsciously.

The Pelman system teaches the man and the woman both how to use their undeveloped faculties, consciously, and how, consciously, to make the best use of the ability and the knowledge they already possess.

Now in almost every person, in addition to imperfectly developed faculties, there exists a reserve of latent power and ability, of which the individual himself is usually unconscious. It exists, not only in those who have never received an adequate education, but in persons of high education and of considerable achievement. In the course of ordinary life, it is often observable that a sudden emergency will call forth an ability to meet it. During the present war, for instance, there have been innumerable examples of men who have done what they never dreamed of doing, and who have achieved what they would have thought impossible. Necessity, danger, and circumstance have forced them to draw upon their reserve powers.

The Pelman system teaches how consciously to develop and employ reserve powers. It teaches, first of all, that their existence is a fact, then how to call upon them and then how to make their use habitual. Again, it is a part of the very remarkable ingenuity of the system, that it applies to the uneducated and the educated alike. The man of slow intellect will, naturally, find the Course more difficult than the man who owns a high degree of mental capacity, but both will use the same methods. The requisite differentiation is made in the help given by means of the work papers by the staff of the Pelman Institute. The answers to the questions set in the work papers enable the members of the staff to give the student the particular advice he needs. The work-papers are examination papers, the answers to whose questions reveal to what purpose the student has read the books of the Course, but they are more. To answer the questions it is necessary that the student should use not merely his memory but his reason, and, therefore, his answers indicate the degree of his mental ability. Hence it is that a student may fail to answer a single question correctly, yet he may be receiving as much benefit from the exercise as a student who correctly answers all the questions.

The Pelman system does not, except incidentally, impart information. It teaches the student how to gain the information he needs in the quickest way. And this practical ability is not acquired by learning a trick, but by consciously observing and following the natural laws which regulate the mind. The information in question may be practical or theoretical, it may consist in technical practice, or in the results of observation, or in the knowledge to be gained from books, the method of acquiring it is the same.

And the Pelman system also teaches the student how to retain his knowledge. It teaches him how to remember. There are, of course, certain peculiar defects of memory which no system can cure. Nor can the Pelman system restore the failing memory of old age, though in many cases the Course will improve it. But, apart from these exceptions, the system produces an extraordinary improvement in the power of memory. What is called a bad memory is usually due rather to mental indolence than to mental defect. The Pelman system shows the student how to overcome that indolence, and also teaches various methods, based upon the natural laws of association, each of which is devised to apply to a particular kind of knowledge; as, for instance, signalling, the parts of a ship, identification of a ship's company, historical events and their dates, and a series of miscellaneous items.

In middle life, when the energy of youth is waning, when the illusions of youth are dissolving, and when the hopes of youth are fading, a man tends to relax, both physically and mentally. His choice is determined, and the incentive of ambition has wasted away. Because he no longer makes the effort required to keep him in condition, his muscles become soft, his chest narrows, his shoulders stoop, his latitude increases out of all proportion to his longitude At the same time, his mental processes become stereotyped, he becomes insusceptible to new ideas, and he begins to lose initiative It is for this reason that I have always advocated the making of admirals at a much younger age than the age at which captains are promoted under the present system The elder man has the advantage of experience, but the younger has all the other advantages. It does not matter how old the admiral may be so long as he is mentally and physically fit, but he should begin his experience as an admiral while he is young

Now, as a course of physical training and continued physical exercise will restore the middle aged to bodily efficiency and enable them to retain vigour and agility to extreme old age, so a course of mental training and continued mental exercise will restore the middle aged to mental enterprise, perception and initiative, enabling them to make full use of that experience which is then recompense for the loss of their youth The Pelman system provides the course of mental training and teaches the method of continued exercise required

The test of the value of the Pelman system, like the test of the value of any other system, is the result What is the testimony of the students who have taken the Course? I have read many letters written by students when they have completed their course These epistles are signed by men in every profession and trade, and in every rank of them The Services contribute letters from admirals down ranks and ratings down to ordinary seamen and stokers, and from generals to privates, and it is remarkable that almost without exception these documents affirm the benefit received by the writers from the Pelman course of study.

Many of the letters received by the Pelman Institute from the lower deck and from the ranks during the Course, begin with an apology for delay in sending their work-papers. The seaman explains that just as he was sitting down in his mess to the work, his ship was ordered to sail, and he has since had no time to spare by day or by night. The soldier says that just as he was lying down in his dug-out, and engaging in Pelman by the light of a solitary candle, the Boche attacked, and after it was all over the soldier could not find his papers. But they stick to the Course in spite of all. And during spells of inaction at sea, and intervals spent behind the lines on land, the study of the Pelman system is described as an inestimable relief to monotony, and as giving a new interest to life.

The Pelman Institute, as I understand the matter, does not profess to work miracles What it does profess to accomplish is to enable a man to make the best use of the abilities he already, consciously or unconsciously, possesses. The first condition of success is willingness to learn The student must be prepared to do his part It is not always an easy part, but it is fair to say both that it is always possible and always interesting

Nor does the Pelman system supplant any system of education There are systems of education, such as sea-training, army training, training to a handicraft, school and university training, which enable the intelligent and zealous student to use his powers to the full But even to him the Pelman system would probably serve to bring to his consciousness, methods which he is using consciously and thereby strengthen his use of them In any case the mental technique imparted by the Pelman system must be valuable to the most instructed

Quite frankly, the Pelman system is devised to help a man or a woman to achieve practical material success sometimes expressible in terms of money Why not?

If the main principles of the system were to be defined, I should describe them as including self reliance and the perfecting of the mind memory, and mental equipment generally the essential condition of success in any career

The Military Value of "Pelmanism."

By Major-General Sir F. MAURICE, K.C.M.G., C.B.

(Late Director of Military Operations).

The Duke of Wellington described the quality of courage particularly needed by a military leader in war as "one o'clock in the morning courage I take it that by this he meant that the greatest test of leadership is the power to make cool, quick, and reasoned decisions at a time when vitality is at its lowest and mental and physical strain greatest The Duke might have said with equal justice that the particular kind of memory most needed in war is the 'one o'clock in the morning memory.' It is a comparatively easy matter to remember when life is running smoothly, when one is well fed, rested, and undisturbed, but to remember even essentials when things are going wrong, when one is hungry, tired, and surrounded by noise and clamour, is quite another matter. This has always been recognised in the training of armies for war, and military authority has always insisted that it is not enough for a soldier to know how to perform any particular exercise or duty, but that he must know it so well as to be able to carry it out automatically when his mind has, owing to strain or disturbance, ceased to function normally. This is why drill plays such a large part in the training of the soldier for war.

Now the Pelman system provides mind-drill based on scientific principles, and taught by experienced instructors. It claims to produce not only a good memory, but concentration, self confidence self control, [illegible] observation, and the thousands of [illegible] to me conveyed from soldiers who have taken the course, both before and during the War, show that it makes no empty claim

Now there are few qualities which [illegible] more essential for the soldier than these, and in fact all the official drill books in use before the War preached their importance, and indeed though somewhat vaguely and uncertainly the methods of producing them In the years after of military training that followed the South African War the Army began to recognise that his eyes are amongst a soldier's most important weapons, either of offence or defence, and training in observation became a regular part of the soldier's instruction Good as this was, it somewhat amateurish in its methods and fell far short of the graduated and scientific [illegible] which is to be found in the Pelman [illegible] These unquestionably do train the eye and mind together to recall automatically all the things within the range of vision, and in this [illegible] is quite unnecessary to insist on the importance of this faculty to the soldier of any rank. From the greatest value of the Pelman system from a military point of view appears to be [illegible] especially in its power to produce [illegible] in the morning memory. I have known the Pelman system for some seven years served both before and during the War with many who have followed it, and it is this particular characteristic of its training which has struck me most. To any officer responsible for the lives and welfare of men, a memory which works instantly and automatically when roused suddenly from a short and all insufficient nap, or, when the brain is numbed by fatigue and want of sleep, is a priceless possession, and there are few gifts which lead more certainly to advancement in a military career. Of the thousand and one things that an officer in a responsible position must remember at such times, some one, and perhaps a vital one may, and probably will be forgotten unless both mind and memory have been trained to cope with emergencies Emergencies are not of everyday occurrence even in war, and it is difficult in the long strain of such a war as this to keep the mind fit to meet emergencies when they come. The Briton as a general rule requires little persuasion to keep his body fit, and none at all to convince him of the necessity of having a fit body when he goes to war Physical exercises and physical training of all kinds play a recognised part in the education of the recruit, in keeping the trained soldier up to the mark, and in restoring the convalescent. But as a nation, if we appreciate in a general way that it is of at least equal importance to keep our minds fit we are far less certain of how to set about it than we are when it is a case of keeping our bodies hard I can think of no better method than the Pelman course either for keeping the mind fit in times of leisure or slackness, or for restoring mental vigour to a soldier whose mind has become flabby from overstrain or physical weakness, and I can recommend no better investment than a Pelman course to the soldier on convalescent leave.

The Pelman system was designed not for war but for peace, and its exercises were originally mainly adapted to the purposes of business and commercial training, but even in that form, which is the form in which I knew it first, it was followed with great benefit by many soldiers. But since the War the number of officers and men who have become Pelmanists has increased so fast that special courses of army exercises have now been arranged, and are still being developed. The Pelman system is not cram, or trick, but a scientific method of training which has proved its value to the soldier in war, and it would I am certain be of the greatest benefit if it were adapted to army training generally.

"Pelmanism."

By Sir H. RIDER HAGGARD.

When I was asked to write an article on Pelmanism I answered that before undertaking to do so I should prefer to examine into the matter for myself The truth is that I was somewhat suspicious of the movement, as most of us are apt to be of educational and other systems of which we know nothing except that they are persistently advertised in the Press

Accordingly I visited the Pelman Institute and spent a long time in company with the Directors, making inquiries of every sort, since which time I have studied a great mass of literature connected with its activities So far as my humble judgment goes, the net result is that I am convinced that not only can the Pelman system do no harm to any human being who adopts the course of study it provides, but that it can and does improve the mental and even the moral capacities of great numbers of men and women in all classes of life, and fit them better to cope with the varying circumstances of a difficult world Also, and to my mind this should be one of the chief objects of all true education, it teaches the student how to teach himself

The great bundle of testimonials tell their own story, upon which it is unnecessary for me to enlarge. The sum of it is that their writers are firm believers in the benefits of the Pelman System, and I may add that after studying this testimony I agree with this conclusion

If, then, it be a correct conclusion, if herein lies an educational plan of considerable and general value, the question arises in my mind whether it cannot be turned to the national advantage Most men of the finer sort, when they reach the evening of their days, on self-examination will find that they are profoundly dissatisfied with themselves, for then their little vanities fade away and they see their failings in a true light, and learn how small they are, even if others should chance to think them big Should they pursue the humiliating investigation, they may begin to wonder as to the causes of their comparative failure to achieve all that they ought to have achieved. Summing themselves up accurately, they may see that, notwithstanding the inherited or individual imperfections of their bodily and mental outfit, enough remains, or perhaps remained, of good and useful qualities to suffice to have carried them much further than they have gone, and to have enabled them to avoid many pitfalls into which they have fallen Something has been lacking to them in their youth—moral guidance, a strong individual influence for good, steadiness of purpose, understanding of the fact that we live to work for ourselves and others, and not merely to find pleasure and amusement, or whatever it may have been That which could develop their gifts and aptitudes fully was not present; that which tended in other directions lay always to their hands. Also, often enough they are aware that in those precious years when the mind is as wax, the observant day of youth went by almost uselessly, so that the impressions made upon it were of doubtful value, or of none at all, for example, that the knowledge which they acquired during their schooling was entirely incommensurate with its expense and the time it occupied, so that they began life with practically everything to learn. Of all this the result often enough has been that either they remain ignorant and somewhat useless, or spend their adult years in painfully cultivating qualities or attaining to information which should have been theirs at the threshold of manhood

Largely, no doubt, this state of affairs is their own fault, or due to the accidents of early environment. Also, I think, that it is due to an extent that is not realised to a faulty system of education. In my day too often a lad was put through a kind of mill, set to grind every sort of grain, and if the resulting flour was valueless, it was supposed that this was because the grain was bad. No search was made for its peculiar qualities, nor did any one attempt to set the stones accordingly The result has been an incompletely educated race, for what applies to the individual applies to the nation.

It may be argued that education is not everything. To take an example: the Germans are the most highly educated and, in their own way, perhaps the ablest people in the world. Yet we see by many terrible examples to what a precipice of decay they have been led by all their teaching. Why is this? I think because it has lacked any moral side Education, properly understood, does not merely mean something which enables people to acquire facts that are useful in the passing of competitive examinations. Indeed, I believe, as I understand that the Directors of the Pelman Institute do also, the entire system of competitive examinations, also their results, to be of doubtful value. True education, if it is to prove really helpful to a man or woman, and therefore, to the nation, must have a moral side, something that strengthens the character as well as stores the mind with the details of various sorts of learning

To me it seems that Pelmanism, as I understand it, does to a considerable extent fulfil this ideal, and for that reason I recommend it to those who, in the fullest sense, really wish to learn and to become what men and women ought to be.

Our nation, like others, is going through a period of awful strain and trouble We hope and believe that we shall emerge from that trouble chastened but safe, if impoverished, distressed, and disorganised Then, unless we are to sink in the world and bid farewell to the proud position which we have held for centuries, must come another period, that of reconstruction On the wreck of the past we must rise to better things. Here it is, I think, that the applied principles of Pelmanism may help us

I venture to commend the idea to those in authority, especially at this time of the consideration of a new and important Education Bill

Education and the Pelman Institute.

By Sir HARRY JOHNSTON, G.C.M.G., D.Sc. (Cantab.)

Some two years ago a Member of Parliament summoned a luncheon party to the Reform Club to discuss the foreign and Imperial policy of the Government I found myself seated next to the Editor of a well-known weekly Review, to whom I instanced the speech of a Cabinet Minister of those days who had just avowed that he knew no geography, as his memory could not retain essential facts regarding latitude and longitude, the navigability of rivers, climatic zones, or the frontiers of the more important States I was very bitter in my comments, because an important campaign under the direction of his Department had just received a humiliating set back The Editor ate his plovers eggs quite placidly—Lucullus still led the Liberal Party, and dietetic restrictions had not been as much as drafted—and said, "He ought to have had a course of Pelman"

Then I found myself led by the insidious interest of the opening paragraphs into reading articles on Pelmanism in the pages of magazines and reviews or on the broadsheet of a newspaper From these I realised that there was an institution nigh to Oxford Street in London for mind culture, called by the name of "Pelman", which some people above the suspicion of interested motives were recommending to the young, the middle-aged, and even those well past their prime of intellectual output. I read these pleas with the same detached interest with which one scans the cures of diseases not likely to attack oneself (as we all think, till the first twinge comes); or the offers to supply what you do not yourself lack or require set forth in the circulars and stereotyped letters fatuously misdirected by the weary employees of unintelligent business firms, who, misled by a county directory, offer you miles of barbed wire for the enclosure of your "park," or a thousand sanitary coops for rearing pheasants, when you have at most two acres of kitchen garden, an orchard, a lawn, and a few herbaceous borders.

Then, again, I found myself in France lecturing to soldiers and to officers at their instruction camps. Quite a number of them were Pelmanists, preparing during intervals in the fighting for the blessed day when Peace should come and they might shape for themselves permanent careers. Crossing the Channel, I heard from an officer who had been in Holland and Switzerland of the Pelman courses which were interesting the interned soldiers and sailors, and, he believed, those that were prisoners of war in Germany. . . .

On calling at the Institute to inquire, and on describing my nearly perfect memory for detail, I compared it on terms of equality with Blank's, that great writer of modern fiction and sociological studies, whose grasp of facts and facets, whose accuracy of observation, are so noteworthy. The silent comment of the Manager was to reach down a list of members and point to Blank's name as having gone through a recent course of mnemonics. This horrid word however, does not figure too markedly in the Pelman statutes It is realised that all such terms as begin with Mn, Pt-, Pn, Phth-, Chth, are relics of Pelasgian barbarism in the Hellenic tongue, and should not be forced into our business vocabulary "Mnemonics," however, was what Pelmanism was called fifty years ago for these principles of mind culture, memory strengthening, are not new, any more than the use of Indian clubs, dumb bells, or hydropathic treatment for the body are twentieth century inventions

But through the organisation of the Pelman Institute the training of mind and memory the co-ordination of mental effort has been brought to the same stage of perfection all perfection is relative, and Pelmanism like Politics, can take no stand on finality As physical culture and hygiene have been developed likewise into recognised sciences It eschews quackery, enlists the services of qualified educationalists, hunts after facts, and unceasingly enjoins accuracy, yet it is tolerant of day-dreams and encourages theorising.

Pelmanism, it seems to me, is not so much in education in itself as the preparation of the mind for education elsewhere, for the education of the streets and shops and countryside, education by home reading, by foreign travel, by secondary schools, and, above all by universities So far from being in rivalry with sound educational institutions, with schools and colleges, it is a preparatory ground for them Its intention is that its pupils shall be enabled henceforth to assimilate and co-ordinate to the utmost advantage all the education they receive or seek for

A full explanation of Pelmanism (with a description of the Pelman Course and a complete Specimen of the lessons) is given in the pages of "Mind and Memory." Quebec

—the Province of Prosperity

Situated on the Atlantic seaboard, with the wide and deep channel of the St Lawrence navigable for the largest steamers, Quebec's cities and towns serve the trade of practically all Canada Quebec's farms, forests, fisheries and minerals show a steadily increasing production, and in the matter of water-power Quebec is one of the richest Provinces in North America The growth in recent years of

MONTREAL—the commercial capital of CANADA

is due largely to the application of electric energy to industrial service. Montreal contains extensive factories for the manufacture of goods of almost every description, including clothing, furniture, agricultural implements, etc, and it has the largest grain mill of the British Empire It is the headquarters of the great Canadian railways, and in it are situated the chief offices of the principal Canadian banks and commercial houses the province of Quebec offers unique facilities on account of the abundance of raw material, the extensive railway and other transport facilities, and the great harbour accommodation.

TO INVESTORS

Splendid opportunities for the remunerative employment of capital are offered in the production of Asbestos, Copper, Gold, Mica, Building Materials, etc.

NORWICH UNION
LIFE INSURANCE SOCIETY

GREAT in Age It is a Centenarian in its own right, and, by its absorption of the Amicable Society, the Oldest Life Office in the World

GREAT in Volume of Business. Its Annual New Business for many years has been in excess of that of any other British Life Office not transacting Industrial business

GREAT in Profit-Earning Capacity. The Quinquennial Valuation as at 30th June 1916 on exactly the same strong 2½ Reserve basis as in 1911, disclosed a surplus of £612,552, after the writing-off of £806,032 as the full measure of war shrinkage of invested funds and excess war mortality The surplus distributed for the previous quinquennium was £627,504.

GREAT in Reserve Strength. After two years of war strain, reserves were set aside on the basis of a strictly net premium valuation at an assumed net interest earning rate of only 2½%, in addition to which a further sum of £383,575 was reserved as a floating War Contingency Fund.

GREATEST in the Fact that the Directors at this war juncture maintained reserves on an even more severe basis than the exceptionally strong standard of 1911

The Tielocken

THE TIELOCKEN

Burberry Weatherproof

Men and women keenly appreciate the benefits conferred by The Tielocken in protecting them against bad weather in all seasons of the year

Doubly convertible, with rubber cuffs it proves an efficient shield against rain cold or wind in a form that maintains every Burberry tradition of distinction and utility

Burberry materials unlike macintosh or oiled silk are perfectly self ventilating, and therefore hygienic wherever the temperature

The Seaside Convalescent Hospital, Seaford,

WH

THIS Institution, the pioneer of its class, is open all the year round, and has during the fifty seven years admitted over 40,000 patients, irrespective of sex, nationality, or creed.

The administration is conducted on the most careful but broadminded lines, and provides for patients convalescent after illnesses and operations the comforts of a home with the resources of a hospital, generous diet, complete rest, and medical attention.

Being without endowment the Hospital is entirely dependent on voluntary contributions, and appeal is urgently made for Funds to pay off outstanding liabilities.

All contributions will be most gratefully received by the Committee and faithfully applied. The consideration of the benevolent is also earnestly sought when making testamentary bequests.

BEING UNENDOWED, YOUR HELP IS URGENTLY NEEDED.
